About the Conference:

Invigorated by an idea of T.S.Eliot, Economic Survey 2016-17 asserts that "humankind can't bear too much reality, recent events suggest that the world can't bear too much globalization either". Pushing and pulling factors drove most of the nations' route of development towards globalization. Developed nations turned out to be advocate of that integrating force while developing and less developed nations like India remained either passive participant or supplier of raw material and importer of expensive manufactured items in the initial phase.

For the institutional backing of globalization, some intergovernmental agencies like IMF, World Bank & WTO came into being with the onus of ensuring free flows amongst the nations. Of late, the shift in trade pattern from tangibles to more in the favor of intangibles transformed the picture and follower nations are gradually turning out to be the leaders. This shook up the dormant spirit of "economic nationalism". As a result, it seems as if the world is heading towards de-globalization. Ban on resource movement and withdrawal from integration are some simultaneously occurred events that making the world realize whether the process of globalization is over? Economic nationalism is temporary or sustained phenomenon? Whether the intergovernmental agencies are done away with their role of holding the world together?

Rational answer of all such question will decide whether we, as a world, are moving from Adam Smith's invisible hand to visible hand of economic nationalism and resultant regulations or not. This answer also carries serious bearings for the fortune of the emerging economies like India because the nation has inherent competitiveness and export potential in many skill-based and labour-intensive services, including healthcare, education, professional, R&D, consultancy, printing & publishing and entertainment.

Therefore, an academic discourse is the need of the hour to unfold the layers of uncertainty in the global environment.

This seminar is an endeavor to strive for the answer of all such questions with its primary focus being on recently occurred global and domestic events and their impact on Indian economy and Rajasthan economy.
